Lot 43: Vintage Konica C35v Camera
The Konica C35 was one of the first of a number of compact cameras that swept the marketplace in the early seventies. Cameras from other Japanese companies introduced after 1970 show its importance and influence. Its appeal to the general public was obvious from the start: it was a compact, light and simple to use camera with an excellent lens that was distinctly wider than average for the time and that took good photographs because it could be focused accurately. The C35v is functionally the same as the C35 except it does not have a rangefinder. While unable to test for function film spooler and the button that takes photos seem to be in good condition at least sound functional.

Lot 44: Vintage Konica C35 Camera
